

NEW ORLEANS

Spurred by new construction projects, trendy businesses are flocking to the South Market District.

Why Now: Once dotted with derelict office buildings and parking lots, the South Market District a formerly abandoned corner of downtown New Orleans—is being revived with new multistory towers offering a mix of residential and commercial space. It's now a magnet for cool hangouts, stylish shops, hot restaurants by notable chefs and an ultrahip hotel.

Where to Go: The area boasts the first Southern outpost of the Ace Hotel, located inside an art deco building that once housed a furniture store. Even nonguests can retreat to the buzzing rooftop pool or relax in the expansive lobby, evocative of a vintage library complete with original terrazzo floors. At the attached boutiques Freda and Friend, you can shop for handcrafted gifts, jewelry and menswear. Or head out to Stonefree for women's fashions with a bohemian touch. Inspire your creativity by popping into the many art galleries dotting Julia Street or browse through the vast selection of art and design books at The Stacks, an independent shop inside the Contemporary Arts Center, Later, pull up to the marble bar at Seaworthy and order some Gulf oysters and the restaurant's signature Holywater cocktail: a layered concoction of rum, cognac, green chartreuse and orgeat. For dinner, reserve a table at Maypop, where chef Michael Gulotta creates dishes that fuse Louisiana cuisine with Asian flavors. Try the handpulled noodles with blue crab and pork sausage in a spicy Sichuan-inspired sauce. — MEREDITH BETHUNE
